Asset management strategy

The fund gained 1.70% in May. Metal prices continued to be pulled between a number of opposing forces. On the one hand, the lull in Donald Trump's tariffs gave the market some breathing space. On the other hand, the growth outlook continued to point to a probable economic slowdown, particularly in China. The introduction of a minimum level of taxes remains a central scenario. Uncertainty also remained high as a result of serious ongoing trade tensions and frequent reversals by the US government, as we saw with Europe at the end of the month. These various factors all depressed risk appetite.

Copper rose slightly in the month: economic uncertainty cannot mask the increasingly apparent tightness in the physical market, as evidenced in particular by the slump in inventories in London and Shanghai and refining margins' long slide into negative territory as refiners compete fiercely to secure supplies of copper concentrate and keep the wheels of their operations turning. Copper listed on the Chicago exchange underperformed that listed in London: pending news about potential US copper tariffs under consideration by the US government, investors cut back their long positions, which generate a high cost of carry.

Platinum and palladium were the top performers in the month. Platinum gained nearly 9% over the period. Here again, the physical market is getting tighter, with demand for platinum up sharply since the beginning of the year. This is driven by a substitution effect in the jewellery sector, particularly in China: the price of gold has risen sharply, resulting in its being replaced by platinum. Meanwhile, markets seem to have downgraded their forecasts as regards the replacement of combustion-engine vehicles – which use platinum group metals – by electric vehicles. Platinum and palladium consumption could thus remain more buoyant than anticipated. Meanwhile, supply continued to slow. In South Africa, which produces 80% of the world's platinum and 40% of its palladium, ageing mines and a lack of reinvestment in the mining sector have caused production to decline sharply. The platinum market, in deficit for a number of years now, is rapidly depleting existing inventory to make up for the lack of supply, potentially resulting in attractive upside. While demand for palladium is declining more quickly, the metal is benefiting from the positive trend resulting from the sharp decline in production (in South Africa it is generally a by-product of platinum).

Other metals in the portfolio posted relatively limited gains. Markets await further developments: import tariffs following the respite granted by the US, a support package in China and a potential economic slowdown will all have some impact on markets over the coming weeks. It is interesting to note, however, that beyond these economic projections, there are increasing signs of tightness in some markets despite the prevailing environment. The blatant lack of mining projects and production development is only likely to add to this tightness over time.
