Asset management strategy

Markets fell as the summer period drew to a close, with the European market losing 2.8% in the month. Macroeconomic figures were disappointing, with composite PMIs continuing their downward trajectory and industrial PMIs even more so. Conversely, oil prices continued to rise, with Brent up 20% over the summer, supported by OPEC negotiations to control supply. Meanwhile, the poorest performers were in metals and mining, adversely affected by downgrades driven by a challenging base effect and a hitherto gloomy outlook for demand, particularly from China. However, the Chinese government's new-found support for its economy and real estate sector helped push up industrial metal prices towards the end of the month.

Second-quarter results were solid, supported by a resilient US economy and persistent pricing power, resulting in earnings forecasts being upgraded for 2023 but not 2024. This is disappointing. Generally speaking, small caps in the portfolio suffered and contributed to the fund's underperformance, examples being Carbios, Afyren and NX Filtration.

The OFI Invest ACT4 Positive Economy fund lost 4.63% in the month, compared with a 2.56% fall in its benchmark over the same period.

Following the previous month's strong performance by industrials, consumer discretionary and tech, healthcare and energy proved most resilient in August. The fund has no exposure to oil- or gas-based energy.

The fund's relative underperformance stemmed from poor performance by stocks in the energy sector (Vestas), banking (with Banca Intesa adversely affected by news of a windfall tax in Italy) and food (with DSM-Firmenich [ingredients] announcing that it was reviewing the amount of its debt and provisions for restructuring). An announcement by Ørsted, just a few weeks after its CMD, set the cat among the pigeons in a sector already shaken by the structural decline in expected IRRs (due to lower interest rates and higher costs, supply issues, administrative delays and highly competitive auctions). The share price took a severe beating (losing 25% in one day) on news that the company had set aside a DKK 16 billion provision as a result of problems related to its US offshore assets.

In the healthcare sector, which outperformed the market, Novo Nordisk made a significant positive contribution. The stock gained 17% in one day on news that the SELECT trial had demonstrated a nearly 20% reduction in cardiovascular risks thanks to Semaglutide 2.4 mg, another application of Wegovy. Novo Nordisk's market capitalisation is now bigger than that of LVMH.

Allianz was added to the portfolio in the "access to financial products" theme. The insurer posted stronger than expected results thanks to its non-life business. It continues to win market share and deliver efficiency gains. The company's strong balance sheet and diversified profile could see it put in place a share buyback programme in addition to its generous dividend policy.
