Asset management strategy

Ofi Invest Precious Metals lost 2.61% in February. All metals in the portfolio continued to correct. Platinum group metals were once again hit hardest, with both platinum and palladium losing more than 5%. Gold corrected a mere 0.61%, while silver lost 2.16%.

Monetary policy continued to put pressure on metal prices. With inflation falling but still in evidence and comments from the Fed's governors continuing to cast doubt on the possibility and timing of a return to more accommodative policy, real interest rates continued to rally during February. This clearly did not help precious metals.

Platinum group metals also remain under pressure due to a manufacturing sector which, despite picking up slightly, remains fragile. The situation in China remains problematic and the market is still waiting for a strong signal from the Chinese government, which is due to convene in March. However, the sector is in crisis and a number of mining groups have let it be known that, given the extent of the decline in the prices of these two metals over the past year, they intend to cut back production. Given the very large short positions built up by speculators, this could trigger a sharp rally in platinum and palladium if more mine closures were to be confirmed.

February also brought the Chinese New Year, resulting in a very quiet period among market operators. This may also explain the reduced interest in these highly industrial markets.

The coming weeks should give us more insight into central banks' real intentions in terms of monetary policy. While no one is expecting the European or US central banks to cut rates at their upcoming meetings, their comments will come under close scrutiny, especially with some observers beginning to entertain the idea that the Fed might decide not to cut rates at all this year. Should that be the case, it could trigger a correction in gold and silver prices. However, given the broader impact such a decision would also have on traditional asset classes, the decline could be measured and short-lived.

We will also be keeping an eye on the National Congress of the Chinese Communist Party in March, which could culminate in announcements intended to support the country's economy. That could also be good for silver and platinum group metals.
