Asset management strategy
OFI Precious Metals lost 4.02% in February. While investors continued to favour gold, the same cannot be said of other metals. Silver fell victim to modest profit-taking, while the platinum group metals corrected much more sharply. As is often the case, platinum group metals had a very strong January, buoyed by new-year restocking by carmakers, for whom these metals are an essential component in the manufacture of catalytic converters. However, as soon as February got underway, appetite for these metals, still affected by potential overproduction, ran out of steam. Platinum held up better thanks to a significantly more positive supply situation. Northam estimates that South African production will struggle to reach 3.8 million ounces, compared with a peak of 5.4 million ounces. South Africa, which accounts for around 80% of global platinum production, is penalised by its ageing mines and lack of new projects. Meanwhile, recycling is suffering as a result of very low margins, while demand is being fuelled by the development of hybrid cars (which need more platinum than combustion engine vehicles) and platinum-for-palladium substitution by manufacturers. All in all, the company estimates that the platinum market could run a deficit of over 30 metric tons this year in a global market of around 250 metric tons. The market could thus bounce back over the coming months. Gold held steady. Despite its sharp rise over the past few months, the still uncertain international environment and the "twists and turns" (to say the least) surrounding a Ukraine peace deal mean the metal is still attractive. The easing in real yields also helped, as did purchases by US traders in anticipation of the potential imposition of import tariffs by the Trump administration. Demand is so high that Bank of England delivery times are now four to eight weeks. This did not help silver, which experienced some profit-taking after gaining significant ground in January. The metal lost 3.31% in the month. The issue of US debt is becoming increasingly central. In particular, some are saying Trump and his administration might be pursuing a policy of a weaker dollar and lower interest rates. The idea, dreamed up by Stephen Miran, now a White House economic advisor who is close to Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent, would be to use import tariffs and offer US protection in return for purchases of very long-term (100-year or even perpetual) US bonds with very low coupons to bring down interest rates and weaken the dollar. Some are already referring to the "Mar-a-Lago Accord". US trading partners would have a "choice" between high tariffs and no US protection, or US bonds with very low coupons repaid with depreciating dollars. It should be noted that this theory would make a lot of sense of many of the political actions taken by Trump and his administration. If such a scenario were to play out, gold would constitute a store of value that could attract the attention of many investors. More than ever before, then, precious metals are a potentially attractive source of diversification in any portfolio allocation.
