Asset management strategy
Ofi Invest Precious Metals lost 0.92% in April. The fund lost steam after gaining nearly 10% the previous month. Gold nevertheless continued to rise, posting its fourth consecutive monthly gain. However, other precious metals failed to track the same trajectory, losing more than 5% each in the month. Palladium, the portfolio's smallest holding, suffered most and is now only slightly above where it was at the start of the year. Gold continued to be buoyed by uncertainty created by the US administration's foreign policy. An array of increasingly aggressive new import tariff announcements and ensuing reactions (reciprocal tariffs, export restrictions, etc.) raised fears of a global economic slowdown and higher inflation. These two expectations benefited gold, which has historically done well at times when real rates are falling. Although the temporary suspension of tariffs on the majority of the US's trading partners raised hopes of a thaw in tensions, this was not enough to fully reassure investors, especially with the situation still very tense with China, which remains subject to punitive import tariffs. ETF holdings almost tripled in the first quarter (up 170%), driven by a sharp increase in purchases in Asia and the US. European purchases continue to lag behind for the time being. Meanwhile, demand for gold jewellery declined in volume terms but increased in value. All in all, demand was 1% higher than over the same period last year and reached the highest level of any first quarter since 2016. Other precious metals did not fare so well. The industrial role of silver and platinum group metals meant they suffered. The correction was particularly sharp at the beginning of the month after Donald Trump's announcement on 2 April that the US would impose tariffs on imports from all its trading partners. This resulted in growth forecasts being downgraded, prompting fears of a downturn in demand for commodities. The situation improved after 9 April, when Trump announced that the new tariffs would be put on hold for 90 days, except in the case of China, which the US administration clearly sees as an enemy. There was a further correction at the very end of the month after figures were released suggesting a slowdown in the Chinese economy. The fact that Chinese markets would be closed for five days with effect from 1 May (International Workers' Day) no doubt also prompted a wave of profit-taking, with some operators not comfortable with being overly exposed for such a long period in the current environment. There is no shortage of factors supporting precious metals: US debt; Stephen Miran's theory of weakening the dollar and pushing interest rates down; the threat to growth posed by import tariffs; repeated threats by Trump, for whom diplomacy is not necessarily the only way to resolve disagreements, towards a number of countries; the president's expansionist tendencies; and so on. All these factors combine to fuel global uncertainty. China could also support those precious metals with more industrial applications. Xi Jinping's government appears to be working on a plan to boost domestic consumption to offset the negative effects of US policy. It is also entirely possible that, once the 90-day pause in US tariffs is over, tensions could ease and the impact on economic activity could be less than currently anticipated. China has already held out something of an olive branch by removing a number of products from its list of reciprocal tariffs. That being the case, we believe the risk is currently asymmetric. Gold should continue to benefit from concerns over the US's reliability as a trading partner, while other precious metals stand to benefit from Chinese economic support measures. It thus continues to make sense to diversify into precious metals.
