Asset management strategy

The index of European stocks once again fell in October, losing 3.40% against a backdrop of geopolitical tensions and fears that the conflict between Hamas and Israel might spill over into a wider conflict. Trade tensions between China and the US persisted, while those between China and Taiwan began to heat up again. On the central bank front, messaging by the Fed and the ECB at the end of the month appeared to suggest a pause in the cycle of rate hikes with interest rates still high, though the mention of stabilisation prompted a reduction in risk aversion and bond yields. The effects of higher interest rates on the real economy are beginning to become very evident.

Earnings season is in full swing (60% of European listed companies have already reported). While earnings have generally been in line with expectations, revenue has fallen short amid declining business volumes, though pricing power remains intact.

Investors have begun to rotate into sectors that are sensitive to interest rates such as consumer durables, technology and utilities, all of which are outperforming.

ACT4 Positive Economy lost 4.62% in the month, compared with a 3.41% fall in its benchmark over the same period.

The fund benefited from a positive allocation effect thanks to its overweights in utilities and tech, both of which outperformed in the month, and its underexposure to consumer discretionary. The automotive sector saw significant sell-offs on the back of generally disappointing results indicating a slowdown in market growth. Equipment maker Valeo lost 24% due to the continuing effects of slowing demand and destocking.

Although the health sector consolidates over the month, the effect of selection is positive despite a profit warning from Lonza. The drop in sales in 2023 is down to the end of the contract with Moderna (CHF 300 million in sales), which will give rise to financial compensation but see sales fall to zero in 2024. Covid-related sales also slowed more sharply than expected. BioMérieux benefited from strong sales momentum in non-respiratory products, BioFire and SpotFire, while Novo Nordisk announced more good news on the commercial development of anti-obesity drug Wegovy.

In industrials, Tomra Systems (down 31%) issued a profit warning due to a weak order book, particularly in the food division, where revenue was down 34% quarter on quarter, and exceptional costs arising from cyberattacks. The company has decided to implement a cost-cutting plan.

In utilities, Ørsted announced further provisions on US wind power projects while Acciona Energia and OKwind both posted strong gains. OKwind (up 9%), which specialises in solar trackers, continued on its ultra-fast growth trajectory, with revenue up 97% over the past six months.
